About KRC

Kabarole Research & Resource Centre is an indigenous non-governmental/non profit making organization, which has been operating in the Rwenzori region of Uganda since its inception in 1996. KRC's integral approach to development is geared towards the transformation of the social, political and economic spheres of the people in the Rwenzori region and Uganda at large. It involves the grass root communities in identifying their needs, designing possible solutions as well as monitoring and assessing their own progress.

KRC Vision

An equitable society of empowered and enlightened people taking responsibility for their own lives in an economically dynamic and environmentally sustainable manner

KRC Mission

To strengthen development processes, involving decision and policy makers, practitioners and academia, which enable the entire society to generate relevant ideas, knowledge, skills and resources for equitable and increasingly sustainable livelihoods

Introduction

Abdolreza at el□ (2006) said that maize is one of the oldest human domesticated plants. Its origins are believed to date back to at least 7000 years ago when it was grown in the form of a wild grass called teosinte in Central Mexico. Recognizing its early potential as a major food crop, over time the Mesoamerican natives managed to improve the crop, by systematically selecting certain varieties for their desired traits. This process, they said, led to the gradual transformation of teosinte to its present day form known as maize.

Maize is an annual plant with high productivity which also enjoys exceptional geographic adaptability, an important property which has helped its cultivation to spread throughout the world. Colonial conquests and trade played a central role in the spread of maize cultivation well beyond the European continent, to sub saharian Africa with favourable climate conditions and Far East Asia (Abdolreza at el, 2006).

Maize as an enterprise is growing in importance not only as a food security crop but also as an income generating enterprise for small holder farmers in the Rwenzori Region and Uganda as a whole. It is estimated that annual production of maize in Uganda ranges from 500,000 to 750,000 metric tons (Gabriel, 2006).

Although most of it is consumed domestically, maize is also becoming a major non traditional export crop particularly in the regional markets. Maize exports have risen since the late 1990s however only one-half of the potential export volumes estimated at 100,000 to 150,000 metric tons per annum has been realized.

In recent years maize farmers have experienced increased production as well as price fluctuations. Farmers have had difficulty understanding market dynamics such as identifying potential buyers of their produce and how to access existing markets or develop new ones.

Farmers have little say over the fluctuating prices of maize and other associated products, and they (farmers) are not benefitting from higher market prices. Middle men have taken advantage of the difficulties to access information by farmers and lack of clear linkages and communication channels between bulky buyers and the farmers.

Different players in the maize sub-sector face multiple constraints that must be overcome before supply can meet the ever increasing expectations of demand for maize and its associated products.

‘Maize bulky buyers in Uganda face a challenge of inadequate supply’. On the other hand, farmers in the Rwenzori Region complain about low prices and the lack of viable markets for the product.

Smallholder farmers lack understanding about existing local, regional and national markets, their requirements and mechanisms, yet this knowledge is vital in enhancing market linkages as well as stimulating market-oriented production.

Therefore, there was a need to strategically identify, assess, and analyse the existing local, national and regional markets that could reinforce the supply side to focus on specific market-oriented production strategies that would increase Smallholder farmers’ competitiveness to meet market demands while improving livelihoods at household level

This inventory/directory of traders in the maize sub-sector has been spearheaded by the Rwenzori regional Think Tank which is spearheaded by Kabarole Research and Resource Centre (KRC) and Mountains of the Moon University. It seeks to link the maize farmers in the Rwenzori region with traders in other parts of Uganda. The processes have been financially supported by Hivos –a Netherlands based charity organisation that has supported development processes in the region for the last 14 years.
